Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: . trunk as possible and straight across the branch, (b) Using the mark as a guide, with a saw, cut the branch half way through beginning at the under side. () Complete the cut, commencing at the upper side, ((f) Cover the cut surface with tar or paint. All such cuts should be clean; there should be no hacking. General Remarks: ---The prevention of the growth of a plant in one way causes it to develop in another, thus the removal of the lower buds of a dicotyledon causes branching higher up, so that a good head is formed on the top of - naked trunk (2A), while pinching the terminal buds gives rise to a low, stocky growth owing to the development of buds low down on the stem and the check to increase in height. Again, vegetative growth is promoted by the removal of flower-buds, and increased branching by that of end buds; in fact, the process of pruning depends on the facility with which a plant responds to checked growth in one direction by increased growth in another. In removing larger branches, the instructions (exercise 6) should be carefully followed for the following reasons: (a) If the branch is cut off at some distance from the stem, the part left is likely to die back and cause decay in the main trunk (/) A cut made straight across has a smaller area than an oblique one, and the activity of the cambium will...
