Grief and mourning are universal human emotions; we feel our losses keenly. Grief unfolds in many ways, and even when the most acute pain is over the loss of a loved one can be felt for a lifetime. In the early stages we often mistake a face in a crowd for our lost loved one, think we hear their voice, or forget that they are gone and plan to tell them something. In our society we are sometimes uncomfortable accepting and dealing with another's grief. We expect people to get over their loss, move on, and keep their mourning private. This was not so in the nineteenth century. There were formal rituals for mourning that included wearing black or gray for a specified period of time, wearing jewelry that included a lock of the loved one's hair, and in some cases, keeping loved ones close through burial on the family grounds or in a cemetery next to the church. The mourning poetry of the nineteenth century is a reflection of a culture that...
